Subject Guide No 6: Disused Underground Stations

Along its entire network of 249 miles, there are in the region of 40 abandoned or relocated stations on the London Underground. Some of these are subsurface and some are above ground, some have vanished without trace whereas others are almost intact. These stations were closed for a range of reasons, from low passenger numbers (Blake Hall was estimated to have only 17 passengers a day at its closure) to rerouting of lines (as with Harrow Town), and have been used for multiple purposes both in the past and in the present day. Aldwych station was for example used during the First World War to house treasures from the National Gallery's collection and during the Second World War to house artefacts from the British Museum, including the Elgin Marbles. Today it is often used as a location for filming, from music videos such as Prodigy's 'Firestarter' to the zombie film '28 Weeks Later'.

Many stations were used as shelters for the public during the Second World War, even if they had already been closed for service (City Road for example). Others acted as decampment areas for both the London Passenger Transport Board Head Office staff and the government - Down Street was fitted out as an underground office facility complete with telephone lines and even played host to a meeting of the War Cabinet at 20 minutes notice. One, Brompton Road, was even were sold to the War Office in 1938 and is still used by the Ministry of Defence today.

This guide is intended as an introductory resource for the research of disused underground stations. It only lists 22 stations as it does not address those stations which have relocated but retained the same name and line service. A longer, more in depth index is available from the Corporate Archives on request. Neither the guide nor the index discusses the issue of deep level 'shelters'. Pointers to resource material on these can be provided on request; however as some of these are still in operational areas within the Underground network, not all material relating to them is yet publicly accessible.

Stations which are outside the London Borough boundary are included. Stations are included whether or not the premises were owned by the London Underground, the criteria for inclusion being that the station was served by underground trains.

In addition to total closures where the station's name has been eradicated from the Underground map, complete relocations of stations have been included.
