Two new giant Tunnel Boring Machines (TBMs) are being used to extend the Northern line as we create the first extension to our Tube network for nearly two decades.

The TBMs were named Helen and Amy in honour of the first British astronaut Helen Sharman and British aviation pioneer Amy Johnson. They will run 24 hours a day, seven days a week, stopping only for scheduled maintenance.

The project is due for completion in 2020. It will include two new 3.2km tunnels extending the Northern line from Kennington (Charing Cross branch) to two new Tube stations at Nine Elms and Battersea Power Station.

Victoria Coach Station celebrated its 85th birthday on 10 March. The three-day celebration was opened by Leon Daniels (pictured), Managing Director of Surface Transport, and featured a procession of vintage coaches.

The event also raised money for the Transport Benevolent Fund, which supports those who work in the transport industry in the UK.
The systems under scrutiny included the heating, ventilation and air-conditioning system, the train horns, windscreen wiper and demister, and the traction motor cooling system.

The test centre provided differing levels of humidity and solar radiation in both static and dynamic air to simulate conditions on the real railway.

Operations Director for the Elizabeth line Howard Smith said: “It won’t be long before our customers will be able to get on board a train, with the first of them going into service in May. It’s important to check that the trains can operate in anything that the changing British weather can throw at them.”

Crossrail Limited was established in 2001 to build the new railway that will be known as the Elizabeth line. Once complete, the line will transform rail transport in London and the South East, increasing central London’s rail capacity by 10 per cent and cutting journey times.

It will run 100km from Reading and Heathrow through new tunnels under central London to Shenfield and Abbey Wood. All stations will have step-free access.

A ROYAL VISIT

Our Elizabeth line trains are being built at Bombardier’s site in Derby, which recently welcomed HRH Duke of Cambridge, Prince William. While there, he took the opportunity to test drive one of the new Elizabeth line trains – named in honour of his grandmother, HM Queen Elizabeth II.

DESIGN FOR LIFE

The new bus station at West Croydon has opened to the public after three years of feasibility, design and construction work. The station sees 150 buses per hour on 25 routes and was deemed inadequate to deal with growing passenger demand. More seating, improved lighting, state-of-the-art CCTV and a large sheltered waiting area are among its new facilities.

PRIORITY SEAT TRIALS

More than 2,500 people responded to a request for help with priority seat badge trials. Research revealed a need for customers with invisible disabilities or conditions to use a badge or card. A trial proved that the card and/or badge makes a huge difference – customers wearing the badge were six times more likely to be offered a seat.

PENSIONERS’ FORUM SUMMARY MEETING HELD ON 14 FEBRUARY 2017

PENSIONER LIASON SCHEME
The Pensioners’ Representatives noted that arrangements were in hand to close the Pensioner Liaison Scheme with effect from 1 April 2017. They expressed their regret and extreme disappointment that TfL Management was proceeding with closing the Scheme, and discontinuing other long-standing pensioner benefits, despite the representations they had made.

TRAVEL FACILITIES
The Representatives requested that consideration be given to providing information to assist pensioners in obtaining current information regarding the services on which their privilege rate staff travel facilities were available. It was agreed that relevant information would be published in a future edition of OTM giving advice on how pensioners can obtain this information.

Dear editor,
On the cover of otm [Jan 2017, issue 54] it states that new buses for routes 504 and 521 are London’s ‘first new all-electric buses’. Not so! London Transport ran 1,800 all-electric buses throughout the 1930s, 1940s and 1950s. They were called trolleybuses, seated 70 passengers and had zero exhaust emissions. They were eventually replaced by diesel buses – Routemasters – that did not have clean engines or fuel. Progress!

Paul Sutherland, retired, LT Bus Operating

Thanks for your letter Paul. You’re right to point this out. Trolleybuses (like the one pictured left) drew their electricity from a central source via overhead electrical wires, while today’s new electric buses carry their electrical batteries on board, providing more flexibility to change routes. So we perhaps should have described the new vehicles as the first new all-electric battery-powered buses.

Hello otm,
Just a quick comment about privilege Oyster cards and the problems we are having. I’ve been trying to get my wife a privilege rate Oyster card, but living in Devon we are a bit isolated from the TfL area and only visit occasionally.

I was told I could obtain a privilege card from booking offices or station staff, but, on trying, the mainline stations were no help, and very few staff or ticket offices seem to be available, especially during busy times.

Hello otm,
I would like to ask if a simpler way of obtaining this card could be found for pensioners, or have I just been unlucky? We have no problems getting staff travel benefits out of London; it all gets more difficult in central London.

Michael Nicholls

Hello otm,

Thanks for your letter. You will need to pick up an Oyster card – which you can do from any London Underground station and some national rail stations. Or you can order an Oyster card online. You will need to pay a £5 deposit.

You will then need to present the Oyster card and PTAC to a colleague at any Underground station. They will add the discount via the passenger operated machines. The discount will continue until the expiry date of the PTAC. The discount can also be added at any of our Visitor Centres, listed here https://tfl.gov.uk/travel-information/visiting-london/getting-around-london/visitor-centres
